

Jessica Crist

Jessica Crist is an education manager for the UN Sustainable Development Solutions Network (SDSN). Before joining SDSN, Jessica worked in international student services and graduate student recruitment at various higher education institutions in the U.S. and Mexico. She also taught English in Chile and conducted research on the Venezuelan and Central American migration crises.

Jessica's research has focused on the intersection between migration and education and she advocates for access to quality education for all, in line with SDG 4. Her work at SDSN focuses on promoting education for sustainable development (ESD) and understanding how ESD can be incorporated into higher education systems.

Jessica holds a bachelor's degree in International Affairs and Spanish Language from the George Washington University Elliott School of International Affairs and a master's degree in International Education from the George Washington University Graduate School of Education and Human Development.
