

Katharine Summers

Katharine Summers is an international development practitioner and researcher focused on migrants and refugees in Latin America. She has significant experience working with both non-profit and international organizations to advance the rights of migrants and refugees across the region.

Katharine's research is focused on education in emergencies for refugee and migrant students, specifically at the K-12 level. She has published several articles on migration and education topics, such as in Revista TRACE, the Journal on Migration and Human Security, and the International Policy Digest, and has several forthcoming book chapters. Katharine has presented her research multiple times and has guest lectured at the George Washington University.

She holds a bachelor's degree in Global Development Studies and Latin American Studies from the University of Virginia and a master's degree in International Development Studies, with a focus on migration and education in Latin America, from the George Washington University Elliott School of International Affairs.